A household includes all persons who occupy a housing unit, excluding the population in group quarters. The count of households always equals the count of occupied housing units. There are two types of households: family and nonfamily. A household is classified as a family if one or more persons living in the same household are related to the householder (who is the first person listed on the Census form) by marriage, birth, or adoption. A nonfamily household is an individual living alone or with other non-related individuals.

The category married couples without children represents three types of households: 1) married couples who have not yet started a family, 2) married couples who have remained childless, and 3) empty nesters (married couples whose children have left home or are older than 18). The other family household type represents several combinations: an adult child living with one parent, two or more siblings living together, or an adult living with another adult relative. Three-fourths of these families are headed by females.

One-person households are often perceived as "young singles" however, only about one-fourth of persons living alone are under 35 years of age, while another one-fourth are middle aged, and one-half are age 55 and older. Among young one-person households, men outnumber women, but among older singles, women outnumber men 3 to 1. Overall, 60 percent of one-person households are women living alone.
